Preventing Burnout in Health & Social Care Professions

How to maintain professional standards & support practitioners
For Health & Social Care Professionals

Monday 25 March 2019 De Vere West One Conference Centre, London

In light of recent research studies from both the General Medical Council and the University of Manchester, the concerning issue of burnout in medical staff and its relationship with lower professional standards; staff absence; early retirement and recruitment shortages continue to be a major challenge for the NHS and social care providers. This innovative masterclass seeks to focus on a number interconnecting issues that are likely to be present: the issue of declining physical and mental health and how it impacts on performance and capability; the issue of stigma and how this relates to absenteeism and early retirement. Research indicates that the prevalence of burnout within healthcare professions approaches 25%.

Another key theme of the masterclass is understand and work with The Equality Act in relation to how to make reasonable adjustments whilst maintaining occupational standards and developing individual and team based prevention and relapse management techniques.

The aims of this masterclass are twofold:

1. To enable managers and heads of departments to recognise and deal with organisational factors that contribute to burnout and associated performance issues and
2. To equip health care professionals to recognise and act on the cumulative effect of emotional stress and pressure that arises with dealing with people with needs on a daily basis.

Facilitated by Gareth Cronin Bsc(hons) CQSW, DCBT, DCG, CPM. Gareth has over 30 years experience of working across a variety of settings within the field of mental health. He worked with Professor Simon Baron-Cohen, Professor Max Birchwood and Professor Lewis Wolpert at Conferences. He has delivered master classes to CEOs on emotional resilience and to Post Doctorates at Cambridge University.
